From the New York Observe

The Secret. BY MISS I. W. BARNES.

" Here, boys, are twenty shillings for each of you," said Mr. Mitchell to his twin sons, Clarence and Edward, on a bright winter morning, as they sat at breakfast-he handed them each a gold piece - I bear that you are at the head of your classes in French and Latin; and this is to express my satisfaction at your progress. You are at liberty, of course. to expend it as you please; but there is an art in spending money. It may be done selfishly, or disinterestedly. It may be productive of happiness, or of bitter memories; and though the sum be small, how to spend it, is worth learning."

" Tell us something about it, lather" said Clarence, after they had both thanked him cordially. " Which way do you think

"I would rather, my son, that you should reflect upon the subject and draw your own conclusions. Watch for an opportunity to do with it something which your heart approved. The love of money. you know, is called the "root of evil ?" but money may be made the source of good. Use it as you think best,"

The boys looked very thoughtral. They wished that he would only my what he thought took. Then they appealed to their mother but she approved of their father's decision, to throw the responsibility on themselves, and call their own judgment were in their lather's library, he said to

"You have not told me how you spent your gold pieces."

Edward drew his from his nocket, saying:

"There it is, father. I have not spent And yours, Chrence T

" It's all gone father."

" Indeed! and what have you to show

" Nothing, sir." Clarence bent his head, modestly but without shame; and there was a manliness in his tone, which convinced his father that all was right,

" Nothing! Well that may be: but I will venture to say my boy has not made an unprofitable investment."

" I hope not, sir," "If he had done wrong with it, he would not be my Clarence," said the mother.

Clarence looked as her with an expression of deep feeling; then went to her silently, put his arms affectionately about her neck, and laid his head upon her shoulder.-When he raised it again, a tear by upon her robe,

" My darling boy !"-she embraced have a right to it : and I am sure it is an honorable one."

"Thank you, mother," he whispered in entistied 9" His mother repeated the question.

"To be sure, my son. I am satisfied. -Come here, and he throw his arms around his, and laid his head upon his basom.-" Father will trust where he has never had cause to distrust."

Clarence could only once more whisper is thanks. It was tenderness, not grief, that caused his tears. He was a type of all that is noble and generous in boyhood, -IInd he been otherwise; had he expended his gift in folly, or in vice, no reproaches that could have been uttered, would have affected him, or called him to bitter repentance, like the confidence which was reposed in him, and the confidence which had just been manifested. To prove himself worthy of that love and earthly ambition. Oh! that all parents would but understand this; and, appealing to the highest nature, the noblest attribute of their children, call them intoexercise.

Edward wished from his heart, that his brother would reveal to nim what he had done; but, there was a code of honor inthat household, as there should be in every home, and it was understood by allits mornbers. Charenes had shown by his silence, that he did not wish to be questioned. Yet, no one for a moment doubted but what he had made a right me of his money

And now, attnough Clarence supposed his secret to be safe from all but the eye of his Father in Heaven, we, who have followed him sussen, and watched him through all, will relate it, in smallence, to

The day on which he received the gift, was bright, clear, and frosty. It was December; and though the sun shone cloudlessly in the blue heavens, it had no power railings or fell from the trees in showers of brilliants, spiintered and shivered by the wind. The air was benthful and exhilarating to the well-selad; but to the poor, unprotected, child of want it came too keenly. Clarence hurried on with his skates flung over his shoulder, to join a ekating party .- It was the vacation, now. Eddie was to join them later. His hands were thrust into his cont pockets, and he pressed on against the wind, when he felt his arm seized from behind,

" Quiek, quiek! Come quiek," said a little barefooted and bare-headed, seemingly half francie with grief and terror. I believe mother is dying. Do come quick.

Clarence obeyed, impulsively; while the child, clinging to his cont. drawed him on.

The home, if such it could be called, was not far distant; and the scene which presented itself, on his entrance, was awful indeed. A woman, surrounded by three or four children, screaming in terror, was tying on her miserable hed, in trightful convulsions. The foam was on her white tips, her elenehed hands seemed fixed in an immovable clasp, and her aspect was altogether horrible.

"I will go for a doctor," said Clarence and comembering that he had seen a physpeed to summon him.

The Doctor followed him immediately : and while he was administering to the poor sufferer, Clarence had time to observe Some days afterward, as the two boys | the scene around him. What misrry was there! Never had be soon, anything of the kind before. The poor mother had toiled, until over-exertion and starvation had brought her to her present state. The children were thin and meagre only half-elad; and there was no fire upon the hearth. When they saw his triendly, earnest face, they gathered around

"Are you hungay?" he asked in a low voice.

"Yes, dreadful hungry." "And cold, too," he said ; and with a heart bleeding at the sight of such destitution and misery, he harried to a restaurant near by. His gold piece was now in requisition. Thank God for its possession !

Hot rolls and hot coffee in abundance soon drew the little famished creatures to a corner of the hovel, where they satisfied their hunger and husbed their cries.

For a full hour the agony at the poor mother lasted-then she lay motioniess from atter exhaustion, and finally fell into a profound slumber. A portion of the gold piece yet remained, and Clarence tendered to the doctor the usual fee. A smile stole over the face of the wealthy him tenderly, "The secret is yours. You Dr. S, (for it so happened that one of the first physicians of the city had, by chance, been summoned,) but there was a tear in his eye, as he looked at him her car. "Does father think so ? Is he earnestly. "God bless you! my noble little fellow," and he laid his hand upon his head. No. keep your money for other good deeds .-But tell me, who you are ?"

Clarence looked up at him and emiled, after a moment's pause, " only my father's son, sir,"

"Well, well; you choose to do your good deeds under a vell, I see; may father should be proud of such a men. I never saw you before; but I think that we shall meet again. You have a heart my boy, too large for that manly little frame," He laid his hand kindly upon his head; shook him warmly by the hand, and disappeared.

Clarence went also, but returned in an hour, bringing with him a pair of new shoes for each of the two eldest children. confidence, would henceforth be his highest | These exhausted the mousy he then had
